The price of our dysfunctional government

Roy. Rosenberg, D-Md., is quoted as saying the following about the Republican Party:

“They have a responsibility to the country. They have a responsibility to their constituents and their children. They are damaging the country, and the public ought to make them pay a price.”

If you were speaking of Congress to a group of people, how might you summarize Rosenberg’s statement about the Republican Party?

For the president to continue in office will require an endorsement from the American people in the 2014 midterm elections. An endorsement is far from guaranteed.

For Congress to continue in the same configuration, a path to reform a deeply divided Congress is the most likely option. The likelihood of such a reform is uncertain.

One of the factors that will determine the outcome of the 2014 midterm elections is the ability of the Republican Party to attract and retain support from a diverse range of interests. This has been a challenge for the party in the past, and it remains a challenge today.

In summary, the future of the Republican Party is uncertain. The party must work to address the challenges it faces in order to have a viable future in American politics.

can’t cut congress out of debt debate

Current crisis could have been so easily avoided.

Can President Barack Obama save the economy? For the past two weeks, I have been talking with other economists about the government’s impact on the economy. Unfortunately, the answer is no. The government’s ability to turn the economy around is limited by its own actions.

On Oct. 7, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, said that the government cannot act to stimulate the economy without dismissing other faiths.

Democracy was successful “Evan-Michelson’s legacy as fragile as he intimated something different. We

If the president could have acted on his own to do what is necessary, it would have been much easier. Unfortunately, the answer is no; the president could not act alone.

The biggest challenge the president faces is the need to work with Congress to pass legislation. Unfortunately, this has not been possible in recent months.

A Republican letdown

AY KAMMEN

Call is the Republican president, but understand that, for all the faults of the jump-thequeue operation, the Republicans do have a respectable track record for getting things done. They believe in limits to government power, but the GOP has not been able to do much to make the president’s job easier. Unfortunately, the answer is no; the president could not act alone.

The biggest challenge the president faces is the need to work with Congress to pass legislation. Unfortunately, this has not been possible in recent months.