Summer fun in Laguna Beach

Art festivals take center stage

HATS OFF TO JUNE SNOW

Angels fans set the Guinness world record for the number of people wearing Santa hats during the team’s 1/2 Way to Christmas’ celebration. The stadium also featured falling ‘snow’ and reindeer.

With the charges against her dropped, Irma Navarro was reunited with her three children.

Mom who chained son finds right help

Santa Ana • Irma Navarro stood six years in prison for chaining her son, but unluckily booking photo uploaded on national news.

But the 37-year-old single mother knew the felony charge of child abuse was determined in a way necessary to bring her family back together.

“I’ll share the court what kind of person I am,” she said and told herself after her arrest.

Now, a year later, she and her children have been reunited and the criminal charges have been dropped. The boys are happier than before, she said, including the 17-year-old son who had always been a little different.

CLAUDIA RICHARDS
WRITER

THE COMBINE SCHOOL DISTRICTS

Report says more moves would improve education, save money.

Welcome to the Department of Redundancy Department.

Class sizes are ballooning. Fun programs are getting Money is tight despite California’s multi-billion dollar Orange County continues to put the educational resources with 27 complete separate districts, district, independent, etc school districts.

Example: In Surf City schools there are the Huntington Beach City School District and the Orange County School District and the Huntington Beach, Fountain Valley, Newport-Mesa Valley district operating a couple of schools within Surf City limits. Each district has its own superintendent, assistant superintendents, school board, etc. The scenario is similar in Anaheim, Fullerton and elsewhere.

Linda Navarro, who chained her son to keep him home while she was at work, was reunited with her children recently.

BY DANIEL GALLEN AND MORE PHOTOS ON NEWS 12

PHOTOS: KEVIN SULLIVAN, STAFF PHOTOGRAPHER

WRITER

STORY BY DANIEL GALLEN AND MORE PHOTOS ON NEWS 12

PHOTOS: KEVIN SULLIVAN, STAFF PHOTOGRAPHER

SIGNATURE SERIES

PRODUCT

LIMITED QUANTITY ONLY

ENDS JUNE 26.

ENJOY FREE
PRODUCT UPGRADES
WITH PURCHASE

$100 OFF
QUALIFYING WINDOWS AND DOORS

0% APR
FOR 12 MONTHS
TO HELP YOU

FOR 12 MONTHS
TO HELP YOU
Speaker says he is concerned with the president's use of his executive powers.

By STEVEN DIACONOFF

WASHINGTON — Speaker John A. Boehner announced Wednesday that he would introduce legislation next month aimed at signaling to his predecessor Barack Obama that his use of executive orders has gone too far.

In a letter to Boehner, President Obama expressed concern that the president is using executive actions to get around Congress and many in the Republican conference — controlled by an administration whose unconstitutional overreach is being challenged by the administration at the heart of the lawsuit.

Nay, Nancy Pelosi of California, the House’s new “maverick,” and John Larson, the White House press secretary, said “that seems to have happened again.”

“The Constitution makes it clear that a president’s job is to faithfully execute the laws; in my view, the president has not faithfully executed the laws,” Boehner said.

Boehner said the bill would allow the courts to review his order through the House General counsel and at the discretion of the chamber’s Republican Legislative Agency.

The speaker did not specify which order he was referring to, but the announcement comes as the House is preparing to vote on a bill to halt deportations for young illegal immigrants, considered the president’s signature immigration policy.

The president has said that the bill would allow the courts to review his order in court.

The provisions of the order would be subject to court review and challenge.

The president has used his executive authority to carry out his obligations under four different laws, and in each instance, every legal scholar agrees that the action is both constitutional and legal.

One of the laws that the president has used his authority to implement is the Affordable Care Act.

Boehner has said in the past that the law is unconstitutional and should be struck down.

The House voted this week to delay implementation of the law until 2014.

Boehner’s statement comes as the House is preparing to vote on a bill to halt deportations for young illegal immigrants, considered the president’s signature immigration policy.

The president has said that the bill would allow the courts to review his order in court.

In Chicago, Illinois, Illinois Republican Emanuel said “that seems to have happened again.”

“The Constitution makes it clear that a president’s job is to faithfully execute the laws; in my view, the president has not faithfully executed the laws,” Boehner said.

Boehner said the bill would allow the courts to review his order through the House General counsel and at the discretion of the chamber’s Republican Legislative Agency.

The speaker did not specify which order he was referring to, but the announcement comes as the House is preparing to vote on a bill to halt deportations for young illegal immigrants, considered the president’s signature immigration policy.

The president has said that the bill would allow the courts to review his order in court.

The provisions of the order would be subject to court review and challenge.

The president has used his executive authority to carry out his obligations under four different laws, and in each instance, every legal scholar agrees that the action is both constitutional and legal.

One of the laws that the president has used his authority to implement is the Affordable Care Act.

Boehner has said in the past that the law is unconstitutional and should be struck down.

The House voted this week to delay implementation of the law until 2014.

Boehner’s statement comes as the House is preparing to vote on a bill to halt deportations for young illegal immigrants, considered the president’s signature immigration policy.

The president has said that the bill would allow the courts to review his order in court.

In Chicago, Illinois, Illinois Republican Emanuel said “that seems to have happened again.”

“The Constitution makes it clear that a president’s job is to faithfully execute the laws; in my view, the president has not faithfully executed the laws,” Boehner said.

Boehner said the bill would allow the courts to review his order through the House General counsel and at the discretion of the chamber’s Republican Legislative Agency.

The speaker did not specify which order he was referring to, but the announcement comes as the House is preparing to vote on a bill to halt deportations for young illegal immigrants, considered the president’s signature immigration policy.

The president has said that the bill would allow the courts to review his order in court.

The provisions of the order would be subject to court review and challenge.

The president has used his executive authority to carry out his obligations under four different laws, and in each instance, every legal scholar agrees that the action is both constitutional and legal.

One of the laws that the president has used his authority to implement is the Affordable Care Act. Generated by the Press