The market for legal jobs is difficult right now and specializing in a particular issue, like international law, can make your job search even more frustrating. Wes Rist is the deputy executive director at the American Society of International Law (ASIL) and author of ASIL's Careers in International Law, a practical guide to pursuing the practice of international law. He will discuss the steps that students can take while still in law school to help themselves stand out in the search for an international law position. Topics covered will include targeted job searching, resume drafting, managing one's professional contacts, identifying appropriate international experiences, pursuing valuable volunteer and professional membership opportunities, and other practical issues that students can undertake.

There will be a dedicated portion of the event for questions by students.

This event is cosponsored by ASIL's New Professionals Interest Group.

This event is a benefit of the UC Irvine School of Law's Academic Partnership in the American Society of International Law.
